Decision

1. The appeal is allowed and attached to this decision is a certificate of lawful use or development describing the proposed operation which is considered to be lawful.

Main Issue

2. The main issue is whether the Council's decision to refuse to issue a lawful development certificate was well-founded. In this case that turns on whether the development falls within Schedule 2, Part 1, Class E of the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development)(England) Order 2015 (the GPDO).

Reasons

3. It is clear from the Council's reason for refusal and associated documentation that there is no contention that the building in question does not meet all the conditions set out in paragraph E.1 of Class E and, indeed, I have no reason to bring this into question. The Council's decision is based on their claim that the building would be of an unreasonable size when considered against the size of the existing dwellinghouse and as a matter of fact and degree would not be commensurate to the existing property in terms of size and scale. This is disputed by the appellant.
4. The Planning Practice Guidance makes it clear that the applicant is responsible for submitting sufficient information to support an application. It goes on to state that in the case for a proposed development such as this the applicant needs to describe the proposal with sufficient clarity and precision to enable the local planning authority to understand exactly what is proposed and what the development involves. The key question for the decision maker is whether the development had commenced on the application date, would it have been lawful for planning purposes.

5. The host dwelling is a large two storey dwelling with a large residential curtilage. To the east of the main dwellinghouse there is a tennis court area and a new outbuilding is currently being constructed. There are other outbuildings attached to the dwellinghouse including a kennel and existing double garage/car port.
6. The proposed plans show a single storey outbuilding which would accommodate a range of functions including the following:
 - An open store for six bicycles, utility vehicle, sailing boat and trailer and four motor cycles;
 - Two offices with space for associated furniture, storage and equipment;
 - Garage for a collection of five racing and seasonal use vehicles, vehicle lift, workshop area, tool storage and racing car parts storage;
 - Machine storage for a range of garden and maintenance equipment; and
 - Potting shed and green house.
7. The appellant contends that the proposed uses would be incidental to the enjoyment of the dwellinghouse in land use planning terms. The Council has also stated that the activities indicated on the submitted plans fall into categories that, individually, may be acceptable as incidental to the enjoyment of the dwellinghouse. However, in the Council's judgement, when taken together the scale of the building would be of concern. The reason for refusal also identifies the footprint of the proposed building which would be greater than the footprint of the main house and would not be commensurate to it in terms of size and scale.
8. There is no statutory definition of "incidental" in the GPDO. Case law provides guidance on how it should be interpreted by decision-makers. In the Emin case¹ it was held that the size of an outbuilding is not relevant for the purposes of Class E, but the building must be 'required for some incidental purpose' in relation to the dwellinghouse. When dealing with cases such as this it is necessary to identify the purpose and incidental quality in relation to the enjoyment of the dwellinghouse, and whether the building is genuinely and reasonably required in order to accommodate the proposed use or activity and thus achieve that purpose. In the Emin case it was held that it is wrong to conclude that an outbuilding could not be said to be incidental as such because it would provide more accommodation for secondary activities than the dwellinghouse provides for primary purposes.
9. I have also taken account of the appeal decision² to which my attention has been drawn and, in particular, the word "incidental" in the GPDO connotes an "element of subordination of the proposed building in land use terms". The Technical Guidance advises that a purpose incidental to a dwellinghouse would not cover normal residential uses such as separate self-contained accommodation or the use of an outbuilding for primary living accommodation such as a bedroom, bathroom or kitchen. An outbuilding that is 'incidental' would contain uses that cannot exist without being functionally linked to and dependent on a primary residential use. Examples of this include storage and hobby rooms or other recreational uses.

10. The range of evidence before me illustrates that in cases such as this it is very much a matter of fact and degree based on the very specific circumstances of each case. In addition, it seems to me that there are a number of factors relating to whether an outbuilding is incidental. The actual physical size is of some relevance, but that should not be determinative. The relevance of size lies in the indication it may provide of the scale of proposed activities and whether they would be subordinate to the main use of the dwellinghouse. There is nothing in the Emin judgment that leads me to conclude that whether a building is incidental should turn to some extent on the size of the proposed building and the size of the dwellinghouse itself. Surely, if Class E sought to impose a limit on the size of an outbuilding or its relative size in relation to its host dwellinghouse, it could have done so.
11. In this case the appellant presents that the space proposed is genuinely and reasonably required by him and necessary to accommodate its intended use. However, the Council disputes this, stating that in accordance with case law some objectivity is required as to whether the building is reasonably incidental to the dwellinghouse. In order for a building to be considered as permitted development all of it must be required for incidental purposes. In land use terms I see no reason why the proposed outbuilding is not required for incidental purposes and indeed the appellant's clear evidence is that it is reasonably required for incidental land use purposes. It would accommodate domestic-related storage, office space, garaging for the resident's vehicles, storage of machinery required for the management and maintenance of the substantial domestic curtilage and gardening-related uses.
12. Therefore, although I do not dispute that it is proposed to be a substantial outbuilding, there is certainly a clear element of subordination of the proposed building in land use terms. I have taken account of the Council's concerns that some of the uses could potentially be accommodated within the existing dwelling, but each of the uses, including the offices, would be functionally linked to and be dependent upon the primary residential use of the site. That is the key question in this case. I am satisfied that the proposed use of the outbuilding is incidental to the enjoyment of the dwellinghouse and consequently it falls within Schedule 2, Part 1, Class E of the GPDO.

Conclusion

13. I conclude that based on the evidence before me and as a matter of planning judgement, the single storey outbuilding would be required in its entirety for incidental purposes. In addition, the size of the building would be commensurate with its proposed incidental uses and, as such it would be permitted development by virtue of Schedule 2, Part 1, Class E of the GPDO.
14. For the reasons given above I conclude that the Council's refusal to grant a certificate of lawful use or development in respect of the outbuilding was not well-founded and that the appeal should succeed. I will exercise accordingly the powers transferred to me in section 195(3) of the 1990 Act as amended.
